George Clear/Clair/Clare

1738-1800, Botetourt County VA, Pulaski County KY

George Clare Clair/Clear born 1738, died Apr 1790 married Mary (Polly) Cox born about 1739, died 1785-1786 Botetourt Co VA. George, Jacob and John Clare may have been sons of Henry Clare mariner of St. Dunstan's Stepney Parish of Middlesex County (Virginia) who was given power of attorney by Adam Smith 16 December 1719 to handle sale of plantation of William Smith in Prince George's County Maryland.[1]

George Clear is listed in 1774 Berkeley County Virginia Census on Opequon Creek near Allen Cox.[2] He located in Botetourt on Glade Creek and witnessed Allen Cox's purchase of property along with Jacob Smith in 1782. George and Polly Clare had: i. Thomas born about 1772, died about 1841. ii. John born about 1774, died before 1822. iii. Mary born 1775, died after 1850. iv. Margaret born 1776, died 1857. v. Francis (Frank) born 1779, died 1816. vi. Allen born 1783, died 1845. vii. George Jr. born 1784, died 1874.

After Polly's death George married 10 Jul 1787 Susanna daughter of Johannes Kessler (Feb 1728-24 Mar 1823) and Eva Dorothy Lehman (24 Feb 1734-24 Jul 1838). George and Susanna had: viii. Jacob born 1788. ix. Daniel born 1790, died 1843. George Clair is listed as taxed for 9 persons in 1785[3] Botetourt Enumeration and taxed for 83 acres in Captain May's Co 1781-1786.[4] George Clear is listed 1786-1790 Botetourt Land Tax [5] District of Hugh Allen with 83 acres that are listed under Susannah Clear 1792-1796 and then under George Clear deceased 1797-1801. According to a court case in Botetourt County 10 Aug 1809 George had purchased right to 380 acres of 1000 acres in common with several other persons and after George's death the patent was issued in name of Thomas, eldest son of George and carried under Thomas' name even though Thomas had moved to Pulaski Co KY. Susanna's father John Kessler included Clear's property into his own survey in order for the Clare descendents to sell the property 1813 and 1822. [6]

A fter George died, Susanna granted permission for her stepdaughters to marry her brothers: Mary Clare to Christian Kessler 26 Oct 1793 and Margaret Clare to Benjamin Kessler 19 Nov 1795. Susanna's oldest stepson, Thomas Clare paid bond for Sarah (Sally) Cox, daughter of Allen Cox Sr. to marry Susanna's brother David Kessler 14 Apr 1792. Sons of George Clear: Thomas, Allen, Daniel and Francis Clare moved to Pulaski Co KY north of the Cumberland River along with their cousins Allen, Ezekiel, Isaac and Jacob Cox sons of Allen Cox Sr.

COX'S STATION

Nelson County settled by Isaac Cox 1780. It was located near the trace from Harrod's Town to both the Falls of the Ohio and Bullitt's Lick, and many immigrants made their home there until they became established elsewhere. Samuel Osburn's deposition in the case of John Young v. Robert Wilson (Nelson Cir. Ct.): "Question. Will you state as many of the settlers as you can recollect at Cox's Station? Answer:

David Cox (he was a brother of Col. Isaac Cox), Jeremiah Anderson, James McGee, Andrew Kimberley, Andrew Vaughan, Jacob Decker, Archibald McDaniel, William Smiley, N. McClarty, Henry Watson, Joseph Enlow, John Hughes, William May (see below), John Bennett, Samuel Osburn (the deponent), Isaac Cox (whom the deponent overlooked), Mrs. Isaac Cox was also there. Her maiden name was Enoch.

The public records disclose these additional names: John Dozier, Samuel Brashear, Matthew Weller, Richard Conner, Matthew Kurtz, George May, "the surveyor of the new county of Jefferson, who arrived from Virginia and opened his office at Cox's Station, then in Jefferson, now in Nelson County." (Collins, Vol. II, page 368.)

William May, who deposed in John Young v. Robert Wilson (Nelson Cir. Ct.) that "Where he now lives has been his place of residence ever since the month of May or June 1783 which was at that time known as Cox's Station and where the Surveyor's Office of Jefferson County was then kept, and remained there for some time afterwards. This deponent acted at that time as Clerk in said office and has a recollection of the notoriety of Surveys." Col. Isaac Cox met a tragic death at the hands of the Indians in 1787, and his widow some time later married this William May.

"John Fitch came to Cox's Station in the fall of 1780," says the above named Richard Conner in his deposition in the case of Hammond v. John Fitch's Devisees (Nelson Cir. Ct.). This is the inventor of the steamboat in whose honor a memorial has been erected on the public square in Bardstown.

The account left by Capt. Samuel Pottenger (1754-1831), founder of Pottenger's Station in Nelson County in 1781, and substantiated by his eldest daughter (Mrs. James Philips) who was born in that fort in 1783, and lived many years near Cox's Station, says that the following orphan children of Robert and Elizabeth Willett Pottenger of Prince Georges County, Maryland were brought to Kentucky late in 1783, and remained in Cox's Station until the following spring when further cabins were put up at the Pottenger settlement: Elizabeth, Jemima, Susannah, Anne and Eunice. The last two were quite small and were placed in large hickory baskets and balanced on the back of a gentle horse, were carried over the mountains to Fort Redstone where the relatives who brought them embarked for Pottenger's Station.

GRAMMER CEMETERY

Location: T27N, R25W., Section 28; or, ca. 2 mi. NE of Marionville, Mo. Sets back in a field about ¼ mi. on private land. Cemetery is fenced but not maintained. It is becoming quite overgrown, partially covered with some type of bush which we were unable to penetrate. We found the stones for Peterson and Martha Grammer back under the edge of these bushes, both of which were down and partially covered with soil.

George Rogers Clark

An Introduction
By Lowell H. Harrison

During the years 1776-1784 George Rogers Clark was the most important military leader in Kentucky and the Illinois country north of the Ohio River. Without his leadership the infant settlements in Kentucky might well have fallen to the British-directed Indians or been abandoned as their inhabitants fled eastward to avoid death or captivity.

George Rogers Clark was born on 19 November 1752 in Albemarle County, Virginia, the son of John and Ann Rogers Clark. Five years later the family moved to Caroline County where the boy received limited schooling that left him with a love for reading and an erratic prose style. In 1772, by then a tall, slender yet powerful young man with reddish hair and blue eyes, Clark traveled westward with a party as far as the mouth of the Great Kanawha River. He fell in love with the western country, and he soon started cultivating some good bottom land below the site of Wheeling. In 1774, as a militia captain Clark accompanied Lord Dunmore's column during the Indian war that agitated the frontier. While he saw little fighting, Clark discovered that he had the ability to lead men, and he gained valuable insights into the character of both militia and Indians.

Clark entered central Kentucky for the first time in 1775 as a surveyor for the Ohio Company. An opponent of Judge Richard Henderson's grandiose plans, Clark decided that Kentucky's future would be best served through Virginia's colonial claims to the region. A Harrodsburg meeting in June 1776 sent Clark and John Gabriel Jones as delegates to the Virginia General Assembly. That body had adjourned before their arrival, but Clark persuaded Governor Patrick Henry and the Executive Council to provide 500 pounds of gunpowder for Kentucky's defense. When the Council balked at giving the powder to "a detached people . . . not yet united to the state of Virginia," Clark retorted "that if a country was not worth protecting, it was not worth claiming."[1] Clark and Jones were refused seats when the Assembly convened, but in December 1776, Kentucky County was created with its own government. Clark was commissioned a major in the militia, and, since none of his superiors was then in Kentucky, he became the effective head of Kentucky's militia.

When the first settlers entered Kentucky they had no formal military organization to coordinate their defensive efforts. Informal leadership and some cooperation was provided by Daniel Boone, James Harrod, Benjamin Logan, and John Todd, all of whom became captains in the new militia organization. When the first formal muster was held in March 1777, the total strength of the militia was probably no more than 140 men. Each company elected a lieutenant and ensign; three sergeants and two corporals were the non-commissioned officers. According to Virginia law, free males 18-50 years of age were members of the militia unless otherwise exempted. Each private was required to have a rifle or musket, a pound of lead, and half a pound of powder. A company was supposed to consist of forty to sixty-four men who mustered five times a year for drill and training. Five companies made up a battalion, and two battalions constituted a regiment. Two annual regimental musters were required, but in actuality much of the militia law was ignored.

In an emergency the county lieutenant could call out the militia, but for distant and prolonged service volunteers were usually called for. Most militiamen were farmers, not soldiers; their primary responsibility was to protect their families and immediate neighborhoods. Because of their parochical outlook, most of the militia preferred defensive warfare that would keep them near their homes. Leadership was of vital importance when they took the field, and in pioneer Kentucky the most effective officers were those who led by example, not orders.

Indian raids into Kentucky increased sharply in 1777 as the British government used Indians "in making a Diversion and exciting an alarm upon the frontiers of Virginia and Pennsylvania." Clark became convinced that a defensive strategy would result in the destruction of the Kentucky settlements, followed by savage attacks along the eastward frontier. Only an offensive war against the enemy would insure Kentucky's survival. He reasoned that forces based on Kentucky should be able to seize the towns in the Illinois country and capture such British posts as Detroit from which many of the Indian raiders were supplied. But to achieve these goals Clark needed more help than Kentucky County could provide, and in October 1777, he returned to Virginia to seek assistance.

Despite some doubts about Clark's bold plan, Governor Henry endorsed the proposal. Thomas Jefferson, George Mason, and George Wythe, entrusted with the secret, promised to seek liberal land grants for those who participated in the scheme. The legislature approved Henry's vague instructions for an expedition "to march against and attack our western enemies," but it was generally assumed that the troops would be used to defend Kentucky. Clark was promoted to lieutenant colonel in the Virginia line, the state's regular army as distinguished from the militia, and was given £ 1,200 in depreciated currency for expenses. He was authorized to enlist seven companies of fifty men each who were "to proceed to Kentucky and there obey such orders and directions as you shall give them, for three months after their arrival at that place . . . ."[2] Henry's secret instructions gave Clark wide discretion in carrying out his plans and specifically state that he could look beyond Kaskaskia to the capture of Vincennes and Detroit. Clark selected Joseph Bowman, John M. Montgomery, Leonard Helm, and William Harrod as his captains and sent them out to recruit.

Clark's new status created problems that plagued him for the rest of his military career. As an officer in the Virginia army, he did not command the Kentucky militia unless they were called out by the governor and placed under his control. Since he was never given as many state troops as he needed, Clark had to depend upon the good will and cooperation of the militia leaders. Inevitably, there were sharp differences of opinion. The militia thought largely in terms of defending their homes, while Clark's area of responsibility soon included the Illinois country as well as Kentucky.

Recruiting was disappointing in 1777-1778, and Clark repeatedly delayed his departure from Redstone, hoping that more men would come. When he finally departed in May 1778, he had only 150 men, and they were encumbered by several families who sought protection for the dangerous river journey. "I knew that my case was desperate," Clark later admitted, "but the more I reflected on my weakness, the more I was pleased with the enterprise . . . ."[3]

When they reached Corn Island at the future site of Louisville on 27 May, Clark put everyone to work establishing his base. John Bowman brought some men from the Bluegrass forts, but Clark sent most of them home, for they were desperately needed to protect their stations. Simon Kenton, the famed scout, was retained; his services were invaluable in the days ahead. Clark pushed the training of his men and was soon pleased with the results. As he wrote a friend, "after I had knocked down some and punished and imprisoned others, they became the best people that can be imagined."[4]

When Clark finally revealed his plans, some of Company A waded the shallows to the Kentucky shore and fled to escape the madman. But on 24 June 1778, Clark and some 175 men left the Falls of the Ohio. Thanks to scouts whom he had sent out the preceding year, Clark had a good idea of what to expect. Leaving their boats near abandoned Fort Massac, Clark led his little army 120 miles cross country to Kaskaskia. They exhausted their food supply and their guide temporarily lost his way, but on the night of 4 July Clark and his men achieved complete surpise. The town fell without a struggle.

George Rogers Clark was a master of applied psychology, and after initially terrifying the French inhabitants he won them over to him. The Americans soon extended their bloodless conquest to Cahokia, Vincennes, and several smaller towns. Friendly contacts were made with the Spanish in St. Louis, and Clark began negotiations with several Indian tribes. No one of his period was more adept than he in Indian diplomacy. He "gave Harsh language to supply the want of Men; well knowing that it was a mistaken notion in many that soft speeches were best for Indians."[5] Clark did not have the resources to buy their friendship had he wished to do so; inadequate supplies were a constant problem, despite the heroic efforts of Oliver Pollock, the American agent in New Orleans, to help him.

When their enlistments expired, seventy of Clark's men went home, but he persuaded one hundred to re-enlist for eight months, and he accepted enough French volunteers to restore his little army to its original strength. When he had exhausted the funds entrusted to him, Clark drew upon his own credit to supply his men with results that would haunt him for the rest of his life. The Illinois country was so isolated that he did not hear from Governor Henry for over a year. Scant bits of news from Kentucky told of persistent raids that threatened the existence of the stations.

At the end of January 1779, Clark learned that before Christmas Lieutenant Governor Henry Hamilton had led an expedition from Detroit and captured Vincennes when its French garrison abandoned Captain Leonard Helm. Clark's usually reliable scouts had failed miserably in this instance, and he and his officers were appalled at the possible consequences of the British advance. Hamilton had settled down to winter at Vincennes and had sent most of his Indian allies home, but with the coming of spring his augmented force would sweep Clark aside and ravage the Kentucky settlements. One desperate hope remained, and Clark took it. They must "attack the enemy in their quarters. If we were fortunate, it would save the whole; if otherwise, it would be nothing more than what would certainly be the consequence if we should not make the attempt."[6]

"I would have bound myself seven years a Slave to have five hundred Troops," Clark wrote; he had to make do with about 200, nearly half of whom were French.[7] A riverboat, The Willing, was armed, loaded with supplies, and dispatched under command of Captain John Rogers to make the long, circuitous trip to a point on the Wabash River below Vincennes where it would meet Clark's party. The following day, 6 February 1779, Clark led his army of about 170 men toward Vincennes.

The distance from Kaskaskia was nearly 180 miles, and a winter thaw and heavy rains had left much of the way flooded. Rivers had overflowed their banks and were often miles in breadth, game had disappeared, the men floundered in sodden discomfort. Clark's rare qualities of leadership never shone to greater advantage than during the last few days of this trek. Indefatigable in his attention to every detail, he kept the men moving even when their food was gone and their morale sagged. Bowman and some trusted men were at the rear of the column with orders to shoot any one who refused to march, but that expedient was not necessary. Men followed where Clark led, and at last they found themselves within sight of Vincennes.

The Willing was not there, but Clark dared not wait for it. The French were ordered to remain in their homes, and they obeyed so well that when Clark opened fire on the fort Hamilton at first thought some drunks or Indians were firing off their guns. Casualties soon corrected that impression, and the British troops barricaded themselves in the fort. Hamilton held a strong position, and an approaching supply party and friendly Indians might well drive off or destroy the attackers. Clark had to have a quick resolution to the standoff. Hamilton rejected Clark's demand to surrender, but he became fearful of his position when most of his French soldiers displayed an obvious reluctance to fight. British morale flagged after the Americans intercepted an Indian raiding party and Clark had four warriors tomahawked in full view of the fort. On 25 February, Hamilton surrendered Fort Sackville with full honors of war. As the American flag replaced the British, George Rogers Clark stood at the apex of his career.

The Willing arrived two days later with supplies and news from Virginia. Clark welcomed a resolution of thanks from the legislature and word that John Todd would relieve him of the responsibility of providing civil government in the newly created Illinois County. Assured that large reinforcements would arrive during the spring, Clark decided not to risk a late winter campaign against poorly defended Detroit. Never again would he be as close to capturing that elusive post as he was then.

INTRODUCTION

As of November 1, 1780, Kentucky County, Virginia, was divided into three counties, Jefferson, Fayette, and Lincoln, by Act of the Virginia Lesgislature passed in May 1780. Since Kentucky did not become a distinct state until 1796, and the records included in this Volume extend only to August 1792, all of these records pertain to matters while Jefferson County was still a part of Virginia. At the time of the division of Kentucky County, Jefferson County included "that part of the south side of the Kentucky river which lies west and north of a line beginning at the mouth og Benson's big creek, and running up the same and its main ford to the head; thence south to the nearest waters of Hammond's Creek, and down the same to its junction with the Town Fork of Salt river; thence south to Green river, and down the same to its junction with the Ohio." Jefferson County embraced approximately one-third of what is now the entire state of Kentucky. Louisville was incorporated as a town in 1780 by an Act of the Virginia Legislature, and as a city in 1828. Campbelltown was incorporated in 1785, and the name changed to Shippingport by 1806; it is now a part of Louisville. The first two Senators to the Virginia Legislature were elected in 1792, Alexander Scott Bullitt and John Campbell. It was on Campbell's land that there was built a warehouse for the inspection of tobacco. A trading voyage past the Falls of the Ohio was by Colonel Richard Taylor and his brother Hancock Taylor in 1769; Richard Taylor was one of the first Magistrates of Jefferson County when formed. The first stockade for protection of a small group of settlers was built on the present site of Louisville in late 1778 or early 1779, and the first encampment of regular settlers was made in 1778 on Corn Island, near the Falls, which included Captain James Patton, Richard Chenowith, John Tuel, William Faith, and John McManus. In the fall of 1779 and spring of 1780, seven stations were built on Beargrass Creek, being small stockaded cabins, at the Falls of the Ohio, Linn's, Sullivan's Old Station, Hougland's, Floyd's, Spring Station, and Middle Station, and within a few years there were stations erected at Sullivan's, Sullivan's New, Daniel Sullivan's, Fort Steuben, Floyds New, New Holland, Poplar Level, Kuykendall's, Kellar's, Brashears', and Asturgus'. Fort Nelson, in what is now the city limits of Louisville, was built in 1780, and enlarged and rebuilt in 1782. Louisville was first laid out in August 1773 by Captain Thomas Bullitt, but few details exist, it being known only that when Louisville was incorporated by the Legislature that there was mention of "owners of lots already drawn." Isaac Kimberley is claimed to have been the first child born in Jefferson County, in 1779, on Corn Island. Captain Thomas Joyes claimed to have been the first born in Louisville, but since he was born December 9, 1787, there were probably others born there earlier. The first woman married in Louisville is claimed to be Mrs. Lucy Brashears.

George May, the first surveyor for Jefferson County, opened his office in November 1782 at Cox's Station, now in Nelson County. Colonel Richard Clough Anderson was first surveyor of the bounty lands to be entered for the officers and soldiers of the Virginia Continental line, for land between the Green and Cumberland Rivers and the the Scioto and Little Miami Rivers of Ohio; his office was opened in July of 1784.

The County Court of Jefferson County was composed of the most respectable citizens, and its limits of authority was undefined. The Court acted as an examining court, also, for white persons accused of criminal offenses, but passed sentences for slaves accused of the same - sentences that were harsh and promptly executed. As example, within these records, one slave was condemned to be hung for stealing "two and three-fourths yards of cambric, and some ribbon and thread."

This Volume contains complete and extensive abstracts of Minute Book A, 1, 2, and 3, of the County Court, beginning in March 1781 and extending to August 1792. These have been carefully abstracted, even though the original books are exceptionally difficult to read, the handwriting cramped, and many of the pages badly faded almost to illegibility. Minute Book A is of exceptional importance since it includes some wills, inventories of estates, polls, and deeds, as well as the Court minutes. The first wills recorded, those of John Coppage and Joseph Irwin, were written before Jefferson County was formed. Mention is made of various soldiers who served under George Rogers Clark in the Illinois Expedition. Book A was copied in 1816 by Worden Pope. Book A ends in September 1783, and Book 1 commences in April 1784, there being no existing records found for the missing months.

These records are of utmost importance to both historians and genealogists, revealing many family relationships, and establishing an early settler's location in this crucial period of Kentucky history.

Continuation of these early records will be found in subsequent volumes of our Kentucky Records Series, as well as other county records.

INTRODUCTION

Some historians treat the advance of the American frontier as though it had been a smooth, steady movement from east to west, where landless people traveled just beyond the edge of the settled areas to start cutting trees for a new farm. But this was not the case. Certain places were favored over others, so the advance of the frontier was uneven - not smooth at all. The settlement of Kentucky is a good example; it started as an island in the wilderness.

Why did settlers bypass so much territory in order to claim land in Kentucky? Why did James Harrod and his companions travel sixty miles to the Ohio River and another 540 miles down the Ohio and Kentucky rivers to claim land on the headwaters of the Salt River? Why did Daniel Boone lead a party of prospective settlers 250 miles through the Appalachian Mountains to find new homes around Boonesborough? Why did Hancock Taylor leave Orange County, Virginia, and travel 750 miles to survey land for himself at the Falls and on Elkhorn Creek? Why did George Rogers Clark leave his land claim on the upper Ohio and move to Leestown? Why did these men not just survey and take up land closer to home? After all, there was unoccupied land available just over the next hill or in the next valley. Why did they move hundreds of miles to this isolated island in the wilderness called Kentucky?

The topography of the region offers a clue to why Kentucky was so attractive to the pioneers. Their "Kentucke" was the rolling country, now called the bluegrass region, lying on both sides of the Kentucky River. It very roughly consisted of the area between Frankfort, Paris, Richmond, and Stanford. The eastern part of Kentucky within the Appalachian plateau was then considered "the wilderness," where no sane person would want to settle. The mountainous country was an area to be passed through as quickly as possible. Much of the nearby land north of the Ohio River was fertile and flat but was also occupied by several Indian tribes. This made it unsuitable for settlement.

On leaving that river [the Rockcastle], we had to encounter and cut our way through a country of about twenty miles, entirely covered with dead brush, which we found a difficult and laborious task. At the end of which we arrived at the commencement of a cane country, traveled about thirty miles through thick cane and reed, and as the cane ceased, we began to discover the pleasing and rapturous appearance of the plains of Kentucky. A new sky and strange earth seemed to be presented to our view. So rich a soil we had never seen before - covered with clover in full bloom, the woods were abounding with wild game - turkeys so numerous that it might be said they appeared but one flock, universally scattered in the woods. It appeared that nature, in the profusion of her bounty, had spread a feast for all that lives, both for the animal and rational world. A sight so delightful to our view and grateful to our feelings, almost inclined us, in imitation of Columbus, in transport to kiss the soil of Kentucky, as he hailed and saluted the sand on his first setting his foot on the shores of America. The appearance of the country coming up to the full measure of our expectations, and seeming to exceed the fruitful source of our imaginary prospects. We felt ourselves passengers through a wilderness just arrived at the fields of Elysium, or at the garden where was no forbidden fruit.[1]

James Nourse's first view of the Bluegrass region is more prosaic:

Set off on foot [from Leestown with Edmund Taylor and George] Rice (having first breakfasted) with my great coat tied to my back. Walked 3 miles and came to the [Kentucky] River. Struck off again by the paved landing along a buffalo path, which soon led to good land - a good bottom and high land tolerable. Came to the foot of a steep hill or Mountain, over which the path led. Steep and rocky but not so bad but a horse might now go up and is capable of being made a waggon road. It is about 2 miles from the river to the top of the hill. The land is level and well timbered with oak and poplars: afterwards it is light with timber - little oak - mostly sugar trees, walnut, ash, and buckeye I call horse chestnut, but the tops of the trees mostly scraggy. The surface of the ground covered with grass along the path which was as well trod as a market-town path [for] about twelve miles. The further we went the richer the land became, though of the same sort of timber. The ash is very large and high and large locusts of both sorts, some cherry. The growth of grass under [the trees is] amazing- blue grass, white clover,

1 "Felix Walker's Narrative," reprinted in George W. Ranck, Boonesborough (Filson Club First Publication Series, Number 16, Louisville, 1901), 163-64.

buffalo grass, and reed pines and waist high - what would be called a fine swarth of grass in cultivated meadows, and such was its appearance without end in little dells.[2]

Obviously these men had found attractive land in an area which was not occupied by Indians. It was isolated but otherwise very desirable with game in abundance and fertile soil. The only problem was that there was not enough of it to go around.

Captain Thomas Bullitt led the first expedition to Kentucky to claim land. In April 1773 he announced his intention to go down the Ohio River to make surveys under the King's Proclamation of 1763, and he invited veterans of the French and Indian War or their agents to join him. His company eventually included about forty men, some of whom joined him en route. By the middle of summer they were camped at the present site of Louisville. Here Captain Bullitt surveyed land for a town near the Falls of the Ohio where Main Street is now located, between First and Twelfth streets, and he generously awarded one lot to every member of his company. James Harrod was present, so he owned a lot at the Falls before he founded Harrodsburg.

The men who had come down the Ohio with Captain Bullitt did not always travel as a group. On occasions several men would leave the main party to explore or survey land far south of the Ohio River. For example, the McAfee brothers hired Hancock Taylor to survey land for them near present-day Frankfort and Harrodsburg, and Isaac Hite and his companions made several side trips but rejoined the main company. From court records we find that James Harrod and John Smith made some improvements in the vicinity of Burgin near the Dix River where they carved their names on trees.

Captain Bullitt returned in October and attempted to enter various land claims in the office of the county surveyor as required by law. At that time Kentucky was part of Fincastle County, Virginia, and the surveyor was Colonel William Preston. Preston refused to record the entries. He explained that they were not valid because there had been no deputy surveyors from Fincastle County with the company and because most of the land was west of Donelson's line in an area reserved for Indians.

2 Journal of James Nourse, 30 May 1775. Reuben Durrett Collection, University of Chicago.

If the claims could not be entered, they would not be valid, so Captain Bullitt faced the possibility of receiving neither fees nor land for his summer's work. When he left the surveyor's office, he must have been disappointed, but he was not defeated. He then appealed to his friend Lord Dunmore, the royal governor of Virginia, who was sympathetic. On 15 December 1773, the issue was debated before the governor and the members of the Virginia council. Thomas Walker, on behalf of himself and other members of the Loyal Company, and Andrew Lewis, the agent for the Green Brier Company, petitioned that officers and soldiers' land not be allowed to be located so as to interfere with their grants. A petition by Hugh Mercer on behalf of those with military warrants was also read, and although their request was not entered in the records, they most likely requested that their warrants could be located on any vacant land in Viriginia. On the following day, the governor and other members of the council announced that officers and soldiers who had served against the French and Indians should be at Liberty to Locate the Grants [they claimed under the Royal Proclamation of 7 October 1763] wherever they should desire, so as not to interfere with Legal Sur[veys] or actual Settlements; That every officer be allowed a distinct survey for every thousand Acres. That those are to be deemed Settlers who resided [on] any Tract of Land before last October and Continue to do so, having cleared some part thereof whereby their Intention to reside is Manifested; And that every Settler shall have fifty Acres at least, and also for every three Acres of Cleared Land fifty Acres more and so in proportion; which is to be taken as part of the Grants to the said Companies respectively, when the Land Office shall be open to them, unless such Settlers shall chuse to hold under the Officers, or Soldiers or any of them rather than under the said Companies.[3]

The same day Governor Dunmore awarded land grants for the Bullitt surveys made for Dr. John Connolly and Charles Warranstaff that were located south of the Falls of the Ohio where Bullitt had laid off streets for a town. Strangely enough, the land grants to Connolly and Warranstaff were awarded even before the land was entered with the Fincastle surveyor; it would appear that the royal governor did not have to follow the rules that applied to ordinary people.

3 Benjamin J. Hillman, ed., Executive Journals of the Council of Colonial Virginia, June 20, 1754 - May 31, 1775 (6 vols.; Richmond: Virginia State Library, 1966), 6: 552-54.

The purpose of a land entry was to reserve a particular tract of public land, that is, to give the claimant priority over others who might also claim the same land before the state issued the claimant a grant. The order for obtaining land in the public domain was generally to mark the site, make the entry with the county surveyor, have the land surveyed, enter the survey with the county, and pay the required fees. The state would then issue the claimant a land grant, then commonly called the patent. The Virginia veterans had received warrants for their military service, which entitled them to various amounts of unclaimed public land, depending on their rank and length of service. A private soldier received a warrant for 50 acres of land, a sergeant 200 acres, and an ensign 1000 acres for each tour of duty.

After the order of council's proclamation of 16 December, veterans of the French and Indian War began to apply for western land entries at the office of the Fincastle surveyor. The first entry was made by Colonel Andrew Lewis on 15 December which was followed by five more entries on 17 December. The entries for Connolly and Warranstaff were not made until 7 March 1774. As these records show, most of the first entries were for land in central Kentucky. The wording of the first Fincastle County entries proves that most of those making these entries had either talked with men who had been with Captain Bullitt or else they had arranged to have land marked off for them during the summer of 1773. For example, Andrew Lewis entered land on Elkhorn Creek northeast of Lee's 2000 acres, marked by Hancock Taylor, and Colonel Hugh Mercer entered 2000 acres on the Ohio which was marked for him in 1773.

On 11 January 1774, less than a month after the order of council had announced that settlers were entitled to land, the Fincastle surveyors started running the boundaries for these claims on the waters of Holston and New rivers. In addition, a few surveys were made in the same area on "Governor's Warrants," which were presumably authorized for military service.

Early in 1774 Colonel Preston organized another party to survey land in Kentucky. For the leader of this new expedition he chose John Floyd, his trusted assistant, and also deputized Hancock Taylor, James Douglas, and Isaac Hite, three men who had been in Kentucky with Captain Bullitt in 1773. This party of surveyors and their assistants left Preston's office at Smithfield on 8 April, traveled down the Kanawha and Ohio rivers, and arrived at the Falls on 29 May. There were sixteen men in the original company, but others joined them after they reached the Ohio. Some of these men later left the surveyors and traveled to Harrodsburg. James Harrod with thirty men had arrived in central Kentucky before the surveyors and had established a camp or "town" near the headwaters of the Salt River.

Floyd and his men had made some surveys along the south side of the Ohio River on their way to the Falls, but upon reaching this famous landmark they proceeded to run the borders for thirty tracts, covering about 40,000 acres (sixty-five square miles). These surveys ran from the river on the north and west sides of the present city of Louisville southwest past where the Watterson Expressway is now and eastward to the present-day suburbs of Anchorage and Prospect. Surveys were made for William Byrd, William Peachey, William Preston, William Christian, and other Virginia leaders. John Floyd and Hancock Taylor also managed to survey land for themselves on military warrants they had purchased.

At the time there was some question about the legality of the surveys at the Falls of the Ohio. The limit of the territory free of Indian claims had been established by John Donelson in 1771; his men ran the treaty line from the present Kingsport, Tennessee, across the Clinch, Powel, and Cumberland mountains. Upon reaching an unknown river, he agreed with the Cherokee delegates that this river would serve as the boundary to the Ohio. The problem was that afterward no one was quite certain which river was selected, since several rivers begin near this place. The headwaters of the Cumberland, Kentucky, and Big Sandy rivers are all within fifteen miles or less of the present Jenkins, Kentucky! To this day there is no way to prove which river had been selected. [4]

However, since the order of council had declared that the officers and soldiers could claim land "wherever they shall desire," many of the surveys were made at the Falls, perhaps in hope that the Cumberland River would later turn out to be the the treaty line. Land on the east side of the Kentucky River was being coveted by the Vandalia Company, so the veterans were also taking a risk by locating land there. Consequently many of them decided to split their claims and locate half on one side and half on the other side of the Kentucky River;

4 It would appear that the proprietors of the Transylvania Company believed that the Kentucky River was the one selected by John Donelson since the eastern boundary of their purchase was along that river. In their Memorial to Congress dated 6 January 1795, (American Archives) they stated that their purchase was "on the back of Virginia."

they felt that if the Vandalia Company were given a royal charter they might lose part of the land but retain the other part, provided that Donelson's line ran along the Cumberland River. If the Indians owned the land west of the Kentucky River, then they might salvage the claim on the east side, provided that the Vandalia Company did not receive a royal charter. As it later turned out, they were awarded land on both sides of the Kentucky River.

At the Falls the surveyors split into two groups, one led by John Floyd and the other by Hancock Taylor. They took different routes to Elkhorn Creek where they intended to make most of their surveys. Floyd also made surveys at Bullitt's Salt Lick and in present Shelby County en route. Taylor and his men visited Harrodsburg before arriving at Elkhorn Creek. The surveyors joined forces again at Taylor's camp near the present Midway but then divided into three smaller parties after making arrangements to survey in different places. Floyd made his surveys along the North Fork, Taylor along the South Fork, and Douglas and Hite south of Taylor's surveys and on Hickman and Jessamine creeks. They intended to meet again in Harrodsburg on 1 August, but hostile Indians prevented this meeting. While the surveyors were working on the Elkhorn, a party of Indians killed several men near Harrodsburg; those in that vicinity quickly returned to Virginia.[5]

The members of the surveying parties were not aware of the attack near Harrodsburg which occurred on 8 July; Douglas and Hite made their last survey on 19 July and proceeded to Harrodsburg. Floyd arrived there on 24 July and found the campfire still burning and a note from Douglas saying that the Indians had killed some men and that they were going down the river.[6] Floyd was nearly out of ammunition, so he and his three companions immediately started for home. Hancock Taylor was not so fortunate. One of his men was killed and he was mortally wounded by the Indians on 27 July. The others in his party returned home without further trouble. It would appear that they were guided part of the way by Daniel Boone and Michael Stoner.[7] Willis Lee, a friend and cousin of Hancock Taylor, brought in his surveys, which were then registered in the county surveyor's office.

When the surveyors arrived home, they found that the militia was being mobilized for a war against the Shawnee. Many of those who had returned from Kentucky were in the Battle of Point Pleasant in October 1774 where Chief Cornstalk's warriors were defeated. Afterward, the main topic of conversation around the campfires was the rich land in Kentucky.

However, others were doing more than talking. Colonel Richard Henderson and several of his associates from North Carolina formed the Transylvania Company and purchased much of central Kentucky from the Cherokee Nation. At the Treaty of Sycamore Shoals which was signed on 17 March 1775, the Cherokee were given trade goods valued at £2000 sterling. Five days before, Henderson had sent Daniel Boone and his road cutters ahead to blaze a trail into the heart of Kentucky for the expected settlers who would buy Transylvania Company land. Boone's party consisted of about thirty white men, at least one black man, and a black women. Colonel Henderson followed about a week later with forty men. There were other parties coming to Kentucky at the same time, some with as many as fifty men and others in groups of two or three. The Fincastle surveyors also returned to continue the work begun the year before. In all, it is estimated that over a thousand men traveled to Kentucky during the spring and summer of 1775.

In the summer of 1775 the Fincastle County surveyors decided to work on the north side of the Kentucky River, thereby avoiding the land claimed by the Transylvania Company. However, they soon discovered that men from the Monongahela River settlements were roaming all across the Kentucky, making claims to some of the best land. As John Floyd complained, "Hundreds of wretches come down the Ohio and build pens or cabins, return to sell them..... Many have come down here, and not stayed more than three weeks, and returned home with 20 cabins apiece, and so on."[8] This practice made it difficult for the surveyors to locate any large tracts of good land. The men who made claims in order to sell the land to people who stayed at home were then called outlyers. Men who were hired to travel west to locate land for others were called land jobbers.

Meanwhile on the south side of the Kentucky River, Colonel Henderson had established a little town which was called

Boonesborough where he had established a land office. He also declared that the area he purchased would be governed as a separate colony and held a convention to establish laws. Anyone who wished to live in Transylvania was expected to purchase land from the Transylvania Company at the initial cost of twenty shillings (one pound sterling) per hundred acres.[9]

At first very few settlers questioned the Transylvania Company's right to the land. Delegates at the Boonesborough convention held in 1775 included Isaac Hite, John Floyd, Daniel Boone, James Harrod, and other prominent men then living in Kentucky. But by the spring of 1776 an opposition party, led by John Gabriel Jones, had been formed. By then the Revolutionary War had begun, and many settlers resented the acquisition of large tracts of land by the upper class. Questions were raised. Were the military warrants issued by the royal governor, then in exile, still valid? Did Henderson and his partners have the right to make a private purchase of land from the Cherokee? Did the Cherokee actually own the land that Henderson had purchased? A more important issue, according to George Rogers Clark, was the ability of the proprietors of the Transylvania Company to defend Kentucky if they were attacked by the British and their Indian allies. Most of the settlers agreed that they could not and, as a result, Jones and Clark were elected by the inhabitants as delegates from Kentucky to represent them in Williamsburg, Virginia.

At the request of the Kentucky delegates, the Virginia legislature decided to abolish Fincastle County and make Kentucky a separate county in December 1776 with the borders being practically the same as the present state. The legislature also decided that any settler on the frontier would be entitled to four hundred acres. It was then obvious that the new government of Virginia did not intend to honor the claim of the Transylvania Company. However, Virginia did not declare the Henderson purchase null and void until November 1778. Richard Henderson and his associates were allowed to keep only a tract of land on the lower Ohio for their trouble, even though Virginia decided that the purchase was good enough to clear the entire area of any Indian rights.

9 In September 1775 the price was increased to two pounds, ten shillings per hundred acres. In addition there was an entry fee of two dollars, plus four dollars for the survey, and an additional two dollars for the deed. The company was to receive a quitrent of two shillings after 1780. See George Ranck, Boonesborough, Appendix O, 29.

Although men continued to claim land in Kentucky after 1776, no provision was made to register their claims until May 1779. At that time the Virginia legislature passed certain acts which acknowledged the legal titles and claims made under the royal government, including those made by settlers and those made with military warrants from the French and Indian War. The legislature also established a land office and defined the procedure for granting unappropriated land.[10]

These laws provided for the appointment of land commissioners who were to hold court near the claims of settlers and determine "all titles claimed in consideration of settlement [for] persons claiming pre-emption of any lands." The commissioners for the district of Kentucky were William Fleming, James Barbour, Edmund Lyne, and James Steptoe. Steptoe declined to serve and Stephen Trigg was appointed in his place. John Williams, Jr., was appointed as the clerk by the commissioners. The commissioners' records also indicate that the sheriff of Kentucky County attended at least some of the court sessions. It is also likely that George May, the surveyor of Kentucky County, was frequently consulted by the commissioners.

The land act also defined those eligible for vacant land and determined when they could make entries at the surveyor's office.

(A) Men who had military warrants for service during the French and Indian War. The size of the claim was determined by rank and time of service. Military warrants were payment for military service. As previously mentioned, some of these claims had already been entered and surveyed when Kentucky was part of Fincastle County. The government honored these claims, and later issued patents for them. The commissioners were furnished with a list of those surveys in order to avoid overlapping the old military surveys with settlers' claims.

(B) Men who were considered bona fide settlers. A settler was defined as a man who had either resided in Kentucky for one year or grown a crop of corn prior to 1778. Men who had lived in villages who had "from necessity, cultivated a piece of ground adjoining thereto in common" were also considered settlers. Each settler was entitled to 400 acres at his place of settlement or convenient to his village for the price of ten shillings per hundred acres plus the fees to the clerk, surveyor, and sheriff. A settler also had the option to claim an additional 1000 acres adjacent to the settlement for the price of £200 plus fees. To obtain a settlement certificate, the applicant usually appeared before the commissioners to prove that he was eligible. He would then receive a certificate of settlement and a preemption warrant that he could enter with the county surveyor.

(C) Men who had intended to settle in Kentucky and had preempted a particular location by marking their choice and who had "built any house or hut, or made other improvements" were eligible to claim 1000-acre preemption warrants at their improvement for the price of £200 pounds plus fees. These men were also required to prove their eligibility before the commissioners' court.

(D) Men who had settled in Kentucky after 1778 but before the land law was passed were allowed to claim 400 acres at their place of settlement for £80 plus fees. The validity of these claims was also determined by the commissioners.

(E) Men who had no settlement or preemption claims in Kentucky could also obtain land by purchasing treasury warrants for the price of £20 per hundred acres.[11] They were then required to locate a tract of vacant land and enter it with the county surveyor. It was not necessary for a man with a treasury warrant to appear before the commissioners.

Those who could not attend the commissioners' courts could still obtain land if they had a valid claim by applying later to the county court for relief.[12] A valid reason for not appearing at the commissioners' hearings was military service in another part of the country. Unfortunately, men who were late in making their application for land were likely to find that their original choice had been preempted by someone else.

It was not necessary for a man to appear personally before the commissioners to make a claim. In fact, only about half of the claimants appeared before them, the others being represented by relatives or neighbors; also six percent had died and eight percent had sold the rights to their claims before they were brought before the commissioners. Nearly two hundred applications were rejected by the commissioners for various reasons which are discussed later.

When a man had a valid settlement claim and his right was proved to the satisfaction of the court, a certificate was issued even if he were deceased or had sold the land. If the heir was his wife or daughter, she would receive the certificate, so we find several awarded to women. On the other hand, a woman was not allowed to make a preemption claim simply because her deceased husband had marked some property; however, a man could sell his preemption claim to another man who could apply for it before the court. Likewise a man could claim land when he hired others to plant the corn and make improvements on the property.

The first land commissioners' court was held at St Asaph's or Logan's Station on 25 October 1779, with later sessions at Harrodsburg, Louisville, Boonesborough, and Bryan's Station. The last session was again held at Logan's Station with the final adjournment on 26 April 1780.

To preserve the priority of the claims, the act allowed those with military warrants or settlement certificates to enter their claims with the county surveyor at any time. Preemption claims could not be entered before 26 April 1780; treasury warrants could not be entered before 1 May 1780. However, the records show that there are several unusual entries found in the Kentucky County Entry Book, such as that of George Mason of Fairfax, Virginia, who claimed land for importing several hundred people into Kentucky at his own expense. George May allowed him to enter a claim for this service, but as it had no basis in law, he was not allowed any land for his trouble. On 13 April 1780, there is also an entry by John May, the brother of the county surveyor, for 800 acres "upon old Treasury rights"; such an entry would have been illegal since this type of warrant was not supposed to be entered until after 1 May 1780, but perhaps being related to the county surveyor entitled him to a few privileges. Another unusual entry by Richard Johnson, dated 29 April 1779, is for the withdrawal of an entry made at the Blue Lick in 1774 upon a governor's warrant and the re-entry with another warrant. Perhap Johnson thought that the governor's warrant would not be valid since it was signed by Lord Dunmore who had fled Virginia in 1775.

The surveyor's office for Kentucky County was located at Wilson's Station, a few miles south of Harrodsburg. The first entries were made on 3 November 1779. From the time the land office was

Appendices

A: Definitions

Assignee: A person receiving rights provided by a land warrant from another person. Since the warrants for land were negotiable, they were frequently bought, traded, or sold.

Call: The direction and distance of one side of a survey.

Caveat: Legal instrument filed with the court to stop someone from obtaining a grant until the the rights of those with conflicting interests could be determined.

Entry Book: Document kept by the county surveyor which listed and defined the claims of those who were preempting vacant land on any type of valid warrant. The courts of Virginia assumed that the first person making an entry with the surveyor had the best right to the tract, all other things being equal.

Escheat: Process by which land was taken from landowners and returned to the commonwealth. In Kentucky some tracts of land were escheated when the owners supported England during the Revolutionary War. One such example is the land claimed by John Connolly in what is now downtown Louisville.

Grant or Patent: In theory, an instrument by which vacant land was conveyed by the government to an individual. Actually, many of the Virginia land grants were for land which had already been granted either totally or in part. Thus a Virginia land grant is better described as a deed to a tract of land assumed to be without prior claims.

Grantee: Recipient of a grant or patent.

Head Rights: Right to land granted for transporting another person to the area.

Land Entry: Usually refers to an entry in the entry book. Occasionally the term refers to an entry in the survey book.

Military Warrant: Document issued to veterans for the right to locate land as payment for military service. The amount of land depended upon the veteran's rank and length of service. Military warrants used to claim land in central Kentucky were for service in the French and Indian War.

Order of Council: Official proclamations from Lord Dunmore, the royal governor of Virginia, and his councilors.

Patentee: Recipient of a grant or patent.

Plat: A survey.

Preemption: Legal term meaning to gain possession by prior right. A person who preempted land thought that he had made the first claim to a particular tract. But it was the first preemption that established the best legal rights. In Kentucky a preemption claim was frequently established by blazing trees and by starting construction of a cabin. Squire Boone even made a preemption claim by painting a stone. A preemption of land could be made by men holding a warrant and also by those without warrants.

Preemption Warrant: A warrant issued by the commissioners of the District of Kentucky in 1779-1780 to men who had settled or had intended to settle in Kentucky before 1778. Each person who qualified could obtain one thousand acres adjacent to their settlement or at their improvement after paying a fee of £ 200 (two hundred pounds). Presumably a man had already made his preemption before being issued a preemption warrant, so this type of warrant was only for land at a particular place. Preemption warrants were also issued to men who had purchased improvements from those who had intended to settle in Kentucky. Apparently they were not issued to the widows of men who had made preemptions but who had not qualified as settlers.

Settlement Certificate: A certificate for 400 acres issued by the commissioners of the District of Kentucky in 1779-1780 to men who had been bona fide settlers in Kentucky prior to 1778. A settler was defined as someone who had either resided in Kentucky for one year or who had planted a crop of corn in Kentucky. Settlement certificates were also issued to men who had hired others to plant corn for them or to men who had purchased the claims of bona fide settlers. Settlement certificates were also issued to the heirs of deceased settlers, including their wives.

Settlement Preemption: Usually a warrant for 400 acres issued by the commissioners for settlement in Kentucky after 1778 but before 1780. The cost of this warrant was £ 80. Sometimes the term was applied to the 1000-acre preemptions that adjoined the 400-acre settlements. Settlement preemptions had no more legal force than any other type of preemption warrant.

Survey: A map or a plat of a tract of land showing the distances and directions of the sides and other items of interest within or adjacent to the tract, such as streams, roads, or village boundaries. It was necessary to submit a survey of a tract before the government would issue a patent or grant. Each survey in Kentucky was given a special number so that it could be properly identified. Only the county surveyor or one of his deputies could legally make and submit a survey. The cost of the survey was paid by the landowner.

Surveyor: In Virginia and Kentucky each county had a surveyor, who was responsible for the land records. In most cases the actual surveying was not done by the surveyor but by his deputies. A survey made by a person who was not deputized was not considered legal and thus had no value in claiming land.

Survey Book: Document kept by the county surveyor which listed the surveys in that county. Included was the name of the claimant, the assignees, if any, the date, the calls, and the name of the deputy surveyor who established the boundry. Later surveys also included the names of the chain carriers and markers.

Treasury Warrant: Warrant for a certain quantity of vacant land which was purchased from the state. Initially the price of Kentucky land was set at four shillings per acre. In May 1780, however, the price was increased to one pound, twelve shillings per acre; at the same time the price of tobacco was set at forty-five pounds per hundredweight. Thus by using the 1991 price of tobacco as a guide, Virginia was selling western land at the equivalent of $6400 per hundred acres in current money.

Treasury warrants were also issued upon the presentation of a voucher for money owed to someone by the state. Holders of treasury warrants were responsible for finding tracts of vacant land, making an entry with the surveyor, and having the land surveyed. Land claimed on treasury warrants could not be entered until after May 1780, thereby giving those with settlement certificates, military warrants, and preemption warrants opportunity to make earlier entries.

Creek, Clear Creek, and Indian Creek, to name a few. So on some occasions the choice comes down to an educated guess.

The zones used in this book are based on the author's opinion regarding the location of the claim. Readers should know that where the land was on the ridge between two zones it was arbitrarily assigned the number of one of the zones but not both. Likewise claims are frequently located on creeks with such common names that they could be in several zones; in this case it was usually assigned to the zone which would be most likely, based on the other entries on the same page. In other words, if several men were making entries near the mouth of the Kentucky River and the next entry was on Mill Creek, I assumed that this particular Mill Creek was the one near the mouth of the Kentucky River rather than the Mill Creek located near the mouth of the Salt River or the one that is a tributary of the South Fork of the Licking River.

Zone 1: This is the area surrounding the present city of Louisville, generally called the Falls of the Ohio by the pioneers. The area runs southward to the Salt River, north along the Ohio River, and includes the land which drains into Beargrass Creek, Floyds Fork, Plumb Run, and Harrods Creek. The area contains approximately 462,400 acres.

Zone 2: This is the area which surrounds the pioneer settlement at Painted Stone or Squire Boone's Station, near the present city of Shelbyville. It also extends south to the Salt River, west to include the waters of Bullskin Creek, northward to include all the waters of Brashears Creek and Drennons Creek, and eastward to the Kentucky River including Benson Creek. The area contains approximately 472,000 acres.

Zone 3: This is the area of the old pioneer settlements that includes Harrodsburg and St. Asaphs (Stanford). It goes from Hammons Creek in the north and runs southward between the Salt River and the Kentucky River as far south as the area drained by the waters of Hanging Fork and the south side of the Dix River. It would therefore follow the old Skaggs trace southward slightly beyond Crab Orchard. The waters of Cedar Creek and Whitleys Creek (now called Walnut Flat Creek) are in this area. This is the smallest zone, containing approximately 336,000 acres. As would be expected, this area has the greatest number of settlement and preemption claims per acre. Approximately fifty-eight percent of all the land was used for this purpose.

Zone 4: This is the area around old Boonesborough. It includes all of the land south of the Kentucky River and northwest of Dix River, including Bowmans and Boones Forks, then eastward as far as Station Camp Creek, but it excludes the waters of Roundstone Creek. The area contains approximately 547,200 acres.

Zone 5: This is the south Bluegrass region. It includes the area northeast of the Kentucky River on the waters of Clear, Jessamine, Hickman, and Howard creeks. It extends westward to the Red River. The area contains approximately 400,000 acres.

Zone 6: This is the north Bluegrass region, which includes Lexington, Frankfort, and the land drained by waters of Elkhorn and Glenns creeks. It was a very popular place in pioneer times because of the rich land, so it was very quickly claimed. The area contains approximately 380,000 acres.

Zone 7: This is the area drained by the Licking River, and some adjacent streams along the Ohio River as far east as Tygarts Creek. This is a large area, containing approximately 2,894,000 acres, but only a few of the claims were in the hillier, southeastern part.

Zone 8: This is the area north of the Green River and south of the Salt and Ohio rivers, which includes the Beech and Rolling forks of the Salt River. This is the largest zone, containing 4,217,600 acres. It extends almost to Madisonville in the west and to Halls Gap in the east.

Zone 9: This is an orphan area on both sides of the Kentucky River that includes the land drained by Eagle Creek and the Little Kentucky River which are not in zones 1, 2, 6, and 7. It contains approximately 870,000 acres. Owen, Carroll, Trimble, and parts of Scott, Henry, and Grant counties make up this zone.

Zone 10: This is the Wilderness Road area, which includes land drained by the lower part of the Kentucky River and by those branches of the Cumberland River which were open to settlement. Not too many pioneers claimed land in this area. This is another large area, containing approximately 3,401,000 acres.

Zone 11: This is the extreme eastern part of the state, consisting of the area drained by the waters of the Big and Little Sandy rivers. There were very few early claims entered in this area except along the Ohio. This area contains approximately 2,197,100 acres.

Zone 12: This is the extreme western part of Kentucky, which was not open to settlement when Fincastle and Kentucky counties existed. It consisted of the area between the present state of Tennessee and the Ohio River and along the southern bank of the Green River to the head spring, near Hall's Gap, then in a line to the Cumberland Gap. This land was originally reserved for the Virginia veterans who fought in the Revolutionary War. So far as I have been able to determine, no one obtained a land grant for Revolutionary War service in any other zone with the single exception previoulsy mentioned.

H: Page Numbers The listed page numbers for chapters one and two, the Fincastle County records, are those found on the documents. The listed page numbers for chapter three are the same as those used in the reprinting of the Certificate Book of the Land Commissioners in the article in the Register of The Kentucky Historical Society 21 (1923).

The listed page numbers in chapter four, the Kentucky County entries, are not always the same as in the original document labeled Jefferson County Entry Book A. The original has a single number on every other page in ink at the upper right corner and another small penciled number at the bottom of every page; unfortunately there is one page out of chronological order and two blank pages; in going over these records the author reinserted the missing page in the correct place and renumbered his photocopies. Thus from the beginning to page 66 his numbers are the same as the small penciled numbers. The original page 67 was labeled page 69, and his renumbered pages continue to page 73, where they again agree with those of the original document.

The listed page numbers in chapter five, military surveys, are from the Year Book, The Society of Colonial Wars in the Commonwealth of Kentucky, 1917. The article by Philip Fall Taylor begins on page 69 and, including the index, continues to page 136. The surveys end on page 126.
